Man About Town

By Carl G. Smith

THIS MIGHT be called a case of initial shock.

The other day, Robert F. Stevens, a horticulturist with the University of Delaware's agricultural extension service, had a Greek in tow and was asked what the man from the Mediterranean was doing in Delaware.

"He came through the CIA," Stevens said. His questioner blanched, fearful that he was prying into top secrets of America's spy system.

Noting the white face and fearful expression of the curious one, Stevens corrected himself, "I mean the ICA—the International Cooperation Administration—not the Central Intelligence Agency."

The Greek, by the way, is studying American agricultural marketing systems.
